AGED WOMAN CONFESSES 'SHINING'

Unusual Case Comes To Light
In Trial In Federal Court
Wednesday.

Judge Cochran cleared up a lot of small moonshining and bootlegging cases in federal court on Wednesday. Indications were that most of the cases against the "big fellows" charged with robbing distilleries, etc., would go over to Lexington for trial, and in this way the docket here might be finished sooner than expected.

The appearance of a 70-year-old woman as a witness in the trial of Fred Goetz, of Lincoln county as a witness, and confessing that in her younger days she had made moonshine liquor, was one of the features of the day. Officers testified that both Goetz and the woman, Mrs. Marsee, went to Deputy Sheriff Monroe Thompson, of Waynesburg, and threatened him that "They'll get you when the leaves come out." Mrs. Marsee sought to take the responsibility for seven jars of whisky, and part of a still being found on Goetz' place. She said she bought the liquor for $25 from a man who was going away and has since died, she declared. Part of a worm was found in a cow barn and another part of a still in a horse barn, and a piece of pipe in the woman's bed. She agreed at length that Goetz knew nothing of the parts of the still or liquor and that she alone was responsible. Officers gave both the woman and her son who testified for Goetz' bad reputations.

Deputy Sheriff Monroe Thompson told how the old woman had come to him and threatened that "They were going to get him when the leaves come out." Thompson is known as one of the most fearless officers in that part of the state. He lives in a section which is alleged to be a veritable hotbed of moon shining, and his life has been threatened a number of times. However, he "goes after law violators fearlessly and is making a great reputation. The jury found Goetz guilty. There are charges against Mrs. Marsee for which Judge Cochran has under consideration.

The Lincoln county contingent is largely represented at this term of federal court. J. J. Falconberry, in the southern section of Lincoln, tried to convince a jury that a still found running just over his fence, wasn't his, and he knew nothing of it. But Sheriff George Delore, of Lincoln, told how he saw Falconberry run a corn patch when the officer got near, and the jury convicted him too. A. H. Feldman, also of Lincoln entered a plea of guilty.

Mack Montgomery, near R. House, who was acquitted in circuit court here when a still was found in his house, after he had been away a week, was also cleared in federal court. Witnesses said a man named Ashcraft admitted he had found it and placed it there. Montgomery was represented by Attorney C. Murray Smith.

Goebel Peyton, of Richmond, was acquitted of a charge of selling whisky to Ed Fogle. Witnesses said Fogle had whisky when he entered the place where Peyton was working. Peyton pled guilty to another count of possessing liquor. Peyton was defended in the trial he won by Attorney George Ross of Richmond.

Leonard Dunn, of Owensley county, who said that he went to Estill to visit his grand father and was arrested at a still, where he went to see a man about a cow, was acquitted of a charge of moonshining.

Eva Bicknell, of Richmond, entered a plea of guilty to charges of possessing, selling and transporting liquor.

Jones and James Simpson were found guilty of possessing, selling and transporting.

Attorney King Swope, secured an order for the return of an automobile belonging to V. F. Diller, of Lexington, which was found on a street there with 25 gallons of moonshine in it. Diller had reported theft of the machine to the police.

In the case of August Brender, Attorney C. C. Bagby, of Danville, brought up the question of convictions in both state and federal court for the same offense. Judge Cochran said that lower courts had sustained the concurrent jurisdiction of these courts and the matter is now before the U. S. Supreme Court.

The only criminal case yet tried during this term of court not concerned with violation of the liquor laws was that of John R. Jackson, a colored youth, who pled guilty to taking a letter from the mails belonging to another and opening it. The letter was directed to Patsy Jackson at Frankfort, it was said. There were extenuating circumstances, District Attorney Smith said, so the boy was let off with a $50.00 fine.

George Roach of Estill county, was found guilty of possessing liquor at his home in Estill county after he had been acquitted in the circuit court at home. He conducted his own defense with much spirit.

Wiley Richardson was found not guilty of violating the prohibition law.

MOST OF BIG CASES TRANSFERRED

Few of the big whisky cases will be tried here at this term of federal court, after all. The Ike Miller, Louis Kay, W. J. Wilson cases have been transferred to Lexington for trial. The former indictment was quashed, and the present grand jury brought in a new indictment late Wednesday. The new indictment contains 52 counts against the accused. The offense of which they are alleged to be guilty was securing through fraudulent permits of 500 cases of whisky from the Frankfort distillery at Frankfort.

The Clark, Barnes, Peters, and Pixler cases from Frankfort, where the defendants are alleged to have stolen about 14 barrels of whisky from the Old Judge distillery have also been transferred to Frankfort, and the Sam Freeman case went back to Covington. This disposes of most of the real big whisky cases, but there are enough minor violations of the prohibition laws to keep the court over several days next week. Clerk John W. Menzies thinks.
